What kind of spaces and places do we need...

... so that the truly new can emerge?

I have been working along this question for many years now in different roles and areas.

During my studies I worked on corporate culture and discovered my passion for leadership and cultural aspects of innovation. I could acquire my first formal leadership experience in a startup which I co-founded and chaired.

I currently live in Berlin and work as a project manager and facilitator for the Global Ecovillage Network (GEN) in the German Government funded project „ Models of sustainable living“. My core activity there is to inspire and connect people to adapt the sustainability concept of ecovillage communities in urban areas by holding workshops and doing public relations outreach.

I also work as a facilitator for a foundation and the network of living and learning centers („LebensLernOrte“) as well as for Leadership³ - an organisation on collective leadership and new leadership culture which I co-founded.

Facilitation to me means to hold a space and intention to enable emergence – that is new, creative, partly unconventional solutions for challenges based on the intelligence of all participants - in an open-ended process. What is special about this space is that it allows to step beyond the initial question and widen the frame of narrow problem and solution definitions.

I am convinced that every system, every person and every group has the solution to its problems already and just needs a space to unfold them. I support you in creating that space where truly new can emerge.

I look forward to fruitful connections and co-creative collaboration!

Warm regards

Jonathan Klodt
